THE CAMDEN EXPEDITION.

A Narrative of the Advance of Gen. Steele in the Spring of 1864.

By A. V. Kentuck.

The Spring of 1864 was one of great activity on both land and sea. The final winter was at its close, and the country was in the process of recovery from the hardships and sufferings of the recent winter. The government was taking steps to secure the safety of the country, and the soldiers were busily engaged in the preparation for the coming campaign.

The campaign was to be directed against the Confederates in the South. The Union forces were to advance through the state of Tennessee, and then turn northward to attack the enemy in the vicinity of Richmond.

The soldiers were well fed and clothed, and the equipment was in good order. The officers were energetic and determined, and the men were ready for action.

The weather was mild, and the troops marched with enthusiasm. The country was beautiful, and the soldiers enjoyed the pleasant surroundings.

The campaign was a success, and the Confederates were defeated. The Union forces advanced northward, and the enemy was driven into Virginia.

The soldiers were victorious, and the country was saved from destruction. The government was relieved of its fears, and the country was once again in peace and contentment.